Messages to anyone

What people write when no one knows who they are, and what the strangers who find it write back

Press presentation

Seabottles.org · October 2026

The idea in one sentence

A place to say what you truly feel, and have someone in another country truly read it.

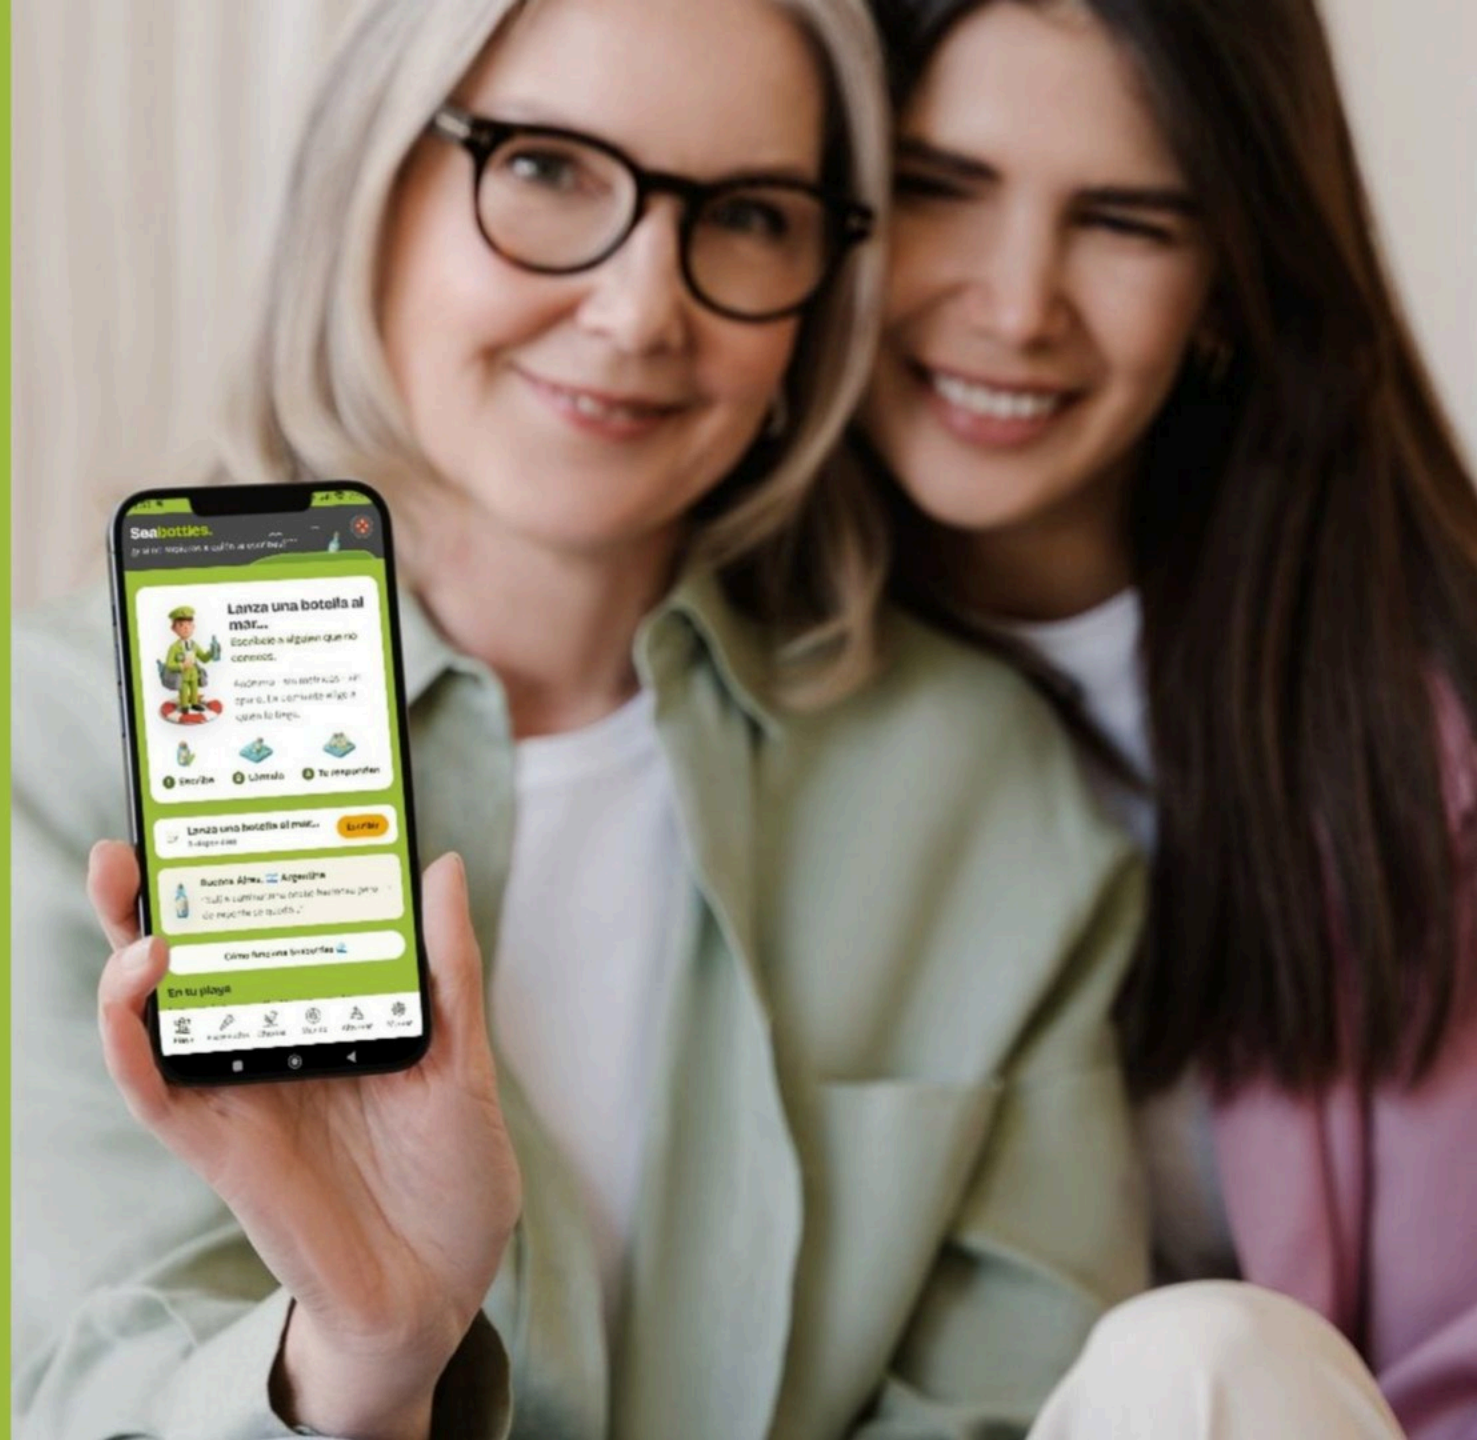

The bottle is just the way to make that happen.

FOR ANYONE

What you feel, in a bottle, out to sea.

Write it from your phone, anytime. No profile, and no one sees who you are: just what you feel like saying.

Seabottles.org

It’s that simple

Go to Seabottles.org

From your phone or computer.

Write what you feel

Without your name.

Cast it into the sea

It travels on its own, at random.

Someone writes back

A stranger from another country.

Nothing to install

Seabottles isn’t an app-store app: it runs in your browser, at Seabottles.org. Free, with no ads and no paid extras.

Seabottles.org

On your phone or your computer

On your phone

On your computer

Just open your browser and go to Seabottles.org. Nothing to download or install.

Seabottles.org

How it works

Write without your name

From one line to a short letter. No photo, no profile.

Cast it into a sea

Life, Thoughts, Love, Dreams, Secrets, Today, or Memories.

It drifts to a stranger

Almost always in another country. They only see your city.

If they want, they reply

And two people who don’t know each other start talking.

No likes, no followers, no algorithm. Adults 18 and over only.

Seabottles.org

Since October 2026

In Spanish, in English, or both

One sea per language

Each bottle travels in the language it was written in and reaches people who read that language.

In both

People who read both languages can choose both, and bottles from either sea can reach them.

A bridge

A bottle that hasn’t reached anyone yet goes first to someone who reads both languages.

No translation

Bottles are never translated. Each one arrives in the writer’s own words.

The entire app comes in both languages: the screens, the Help section, and the legal pages.

Seabottles.org

Inside the app

You write on the Shore, the bottle heads out to sea, and someone in another country finds it. This one came from Lima.

Shore: write and cast

A bottle from Lima

Crossed Paths: two strangers

Seabottles.org

A sea that moves

Each bottle travels for days. You can follow its journey, see where people are writing from, and light the lighthouse every day.

The world, right now

A bottle at sea

The daily lighthouse

chats are between people from different countries

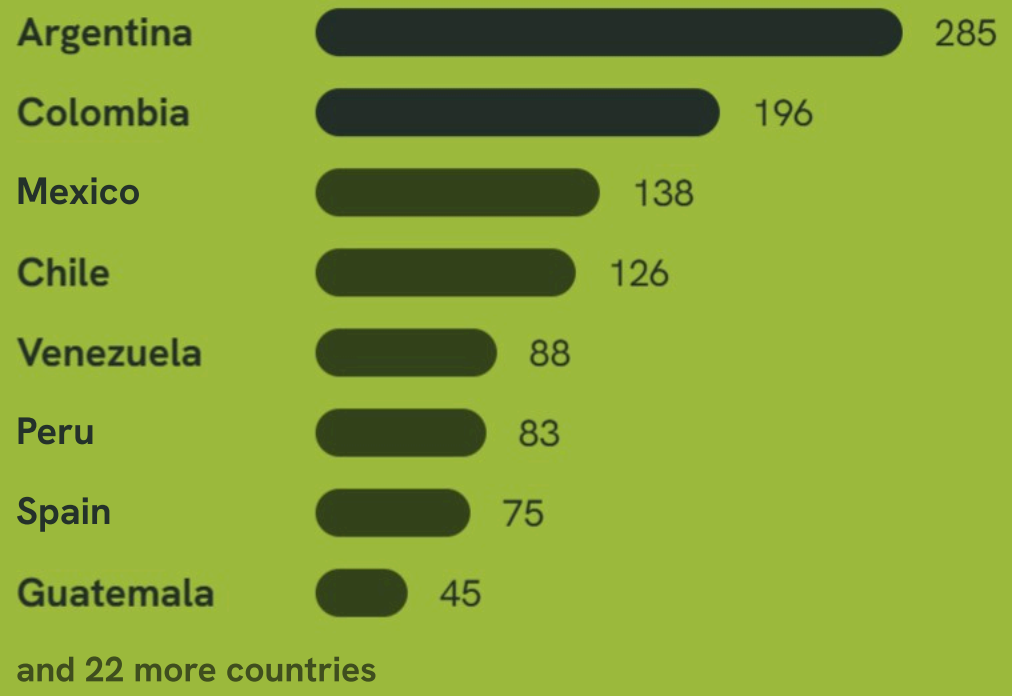

Since August 13: nearly 1,200 people, more than 1,500 bottles, 30 countries, and 200 cities.

Seabottles production data as of October 6, 2026

Seabottles.org

Where people write from

People from 30 countries and about 200 cities.
Almost the whole sea speaks Spanish: from Argentina to Mexico, and from Spain to the Caribbean.
All you see of each person is their city and country.
Never a name.

What people write about

What people write most isn’t secrets: it’s thoughts and everyday life.

Bottles per sea as of 10/6/2026. Each bottle sails in one to three seas, so the numbers add up to more than the total.

Real bottles

«El aire frío que entra a través de mi ventana abierta me hace sentir que estoy viva.»

Spain

«Tendré tiempo para mí recién a los 50 años. Ya crié, ya eduqué, ya serví. Descubrí un hobby que me encanta y daré rienda suelta a crear y disfrutar.»

Chile

«¿Y si alguien en algún lugar del mundo me lee y me entiende y me siente y me abraza y da con esas palabras que necesito oír?»

Chile

Public Open Sea bottles, already posted anonymously on Seabottles' channels. In their original Spanish: bottles are never translated.

Seabottles.org

Messages to no one in particular

«Te escribo desde un lugar donde no hay mar. Te escribo simplemente para conectar dos puntos en el mundo.»

Bolivia

«Tantos sueños y no sé nadar...»

Venezuela

«Plan absurdo pero divertido: ir a saltar en los inflables aunque ya tengas más de 20 años.»

Peru

No one writes to one person: they write to the world, and the world writes back.

What strangers write back

|---|---|
| 2 lines | is the length of a typical reply: short, like a note sent back |
| 1 in 7 | replies ends with a question: an invitation to keep talking |
| 2,970 | times someone tapped “this one reached me” in silence |
| 263 | messages in the longest chat between two strangers; 50 chats went past 20 |

Aggregate data as of 10/6/2026. Replies and chats are private: no one reads them, and they’re never quoted.

Seabottles.org

Why anonymity invites honesty

No audience

No likes, no followers. No one to perform for.

No rush

The bottle takes time to arrive. No one expects an instant reply.

No judgment

Nobody knows who you are. Just your city and country.

No one writes an honest letter in a comment box. But they'll write one to put in a bottle.

Seabottles.org

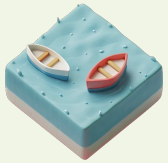

In their own words

An “anti-social network,” in the best sense

Honesty

People write what they truly feel. There’s no persona to keep up and no image to protect.

No expectations, no stereotypes

With no photos and no profiles, you respond to what someone writes, not to how they look.

Sharing your life

People talk about their everyday lives and meet others, often from other countries.

None of the toxicity or hostility of other social networks. Just a calm place to talk and listen.

An idea from 2011 that went back to sea

2011

Fernando Debernardi creates Seabottles in Buenos Aires.

2012

CNN en Español introduces it to all of Latin America.

2026

He rebuilds it on his own, directing artificial intelligence, in a month.

Today

People in 30 countries writing to each other, anonymously.

AI built the platform. People write the bottles: no message at sea is written by a machine.
